MCL is basically an algorithm for robots to localize, or figure out, its position. MCL uses a particle filter. The particle filter uses particles to estimate the robot's current position and possible future destinations. When a robot senses something, the particles can be placed with more precision and accuracy since the robot can compare the sensed data with predicted or known data. All in all, MCL's purpose is to help the robot move and sense its location.